PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Culture ... What is All The Fuss About?

“Love your people and the rest will follow”. – Gil Chua, DDB Group Chairman

I am devoting this piece to share DDB's Chief Culture Officer, Anna Chua-Norbert message to all those that missed her talk on, “Driving Growth Through Company Culture”.

According to Anna, succession challenges, ability to attract and retain talent is among the top 10 risks for 2022 and is projected to still be among the top 10 risks in 2031. Anna shared that 65% of employees see CULTURE as a key factor in deciding to join a company, as well as whether to stay or not. This is what all the fuss is about.

Before we go on, what is culture? Culture is a set of values and behaviors that are shared by all members of an organization. Staffing that seeks and hires only talented individuals with the right attitude; in tune with values and behaviors.

To Anna's point, company culture is much more than a company's history and positioning. DDB is built around teams that encourage idea transfer and peer-based training, recognition, self-management; and champions learning, innovation and adaptability to change.

In DDB, culture fit is an operational imperative, meaning employees share the company's values and beliefs.

Anna says employers with a good work culture means Gen Z (born after 1997) stay for about two years. With a dedicated culture team that ensures alignment to their five pillars and delivers compelling culture programs that are relevant to millennials like team-based community service led DDB to become the employer of choice retaining and recognizing staff, longer.

Craig Lonnee, DDB's Chief Development Officer says that there are false assertions that strategy is hard; culture is soft and the success of a strategy can be measured, while that of a culture cannot. Craig asserts that culture is an enabler of an effective strategy; making the management of change easier and faster.

succession challenges, ability to attract and retain talent is among the top 10 risks for 2022 and is projected to still be among the top 10 risks in 2031.

With a dedicated culture team that ensures alignment to their five pillars and delivers compelling culture programs that are relevant to millennials like team-based community service led DDB to become the employer of choice retaining and recognizing staff, longer.

Craig maintains culture is not soft and the impact of culture on profit and long-term competitive success can be quantified; and with proper leadership, a culture change can be engineered in months, not years.

What happens if the culture is bad? The end result is high turnover, significantly impacting the bottom line. Not only does the business lose time and money in replacing the position, but it also loses both intellectual capital and the value of its investment in that staff member.

Worse, when it leads to a domino effect, with others leaving because they are overworked after their colleagues' departures. If things become bad enough, the company develops a reputation as a poor culture and struggles to recruit talent.

A McKinsey study found that the companies that are winning the war for talent have instilled a talent mindset throughout the firm, starting from the top. This requires the CEO to consistently, and at every opportunity, drive home the message that talent management is everyone's job.

"Capital is being superseded by creativity and the ability to innovate – and therefore by human talents – as the most important factors of production. Capital is now giving way to human talent. "Talentism" is the new capitalism." - Klaus Schwab, Executive Chair, World Economic Forum

DDB instils The Four Freedoms across its staff.

1. Freedom from Chaos: valuing the time and energy of employees.
2. Freedom to Fail: embracing failure with the intention of exploring new territories.
3. Freedom from Fear: inspiring courage, acting with positive intent, share accountability.
4. Freedom to Be: combining unique perspectives, enjoying personal fulfillment, laughter, celebration.

In an environment where the war for talent keeps intensifying, it is of paramount importance that an employer can clearly articulate a crisp Employee Value Proposition (EVP) that answers the question, "why would anyone want to work for you?"

In the case of DDB, Anna explains the focus of their EVP, being one of holistic well-being, ensuring health, in all its forms, is looked out for across five pillars: Physical, Mental, Spiritual, Financial, Career and Societal.

I am a firm believer that culture can change the fortunes of a business. For example, there is a bake shop that I dread going to. When I go, I am in and out of the store quickly, I probably would buy more items, but each time I walk in, I feel a vibe that's a little off, with their unfriendly staff invariably making me feel uncomfortable.

In an environment where the war for talent keeps intensifying, it is of paramount importance that an employer can clearly articulate a crisp Employee Value Proposition (EVP) that answers the question, "why would anyone want to work for you?"

In closing, as a leader, it's critical to create the right culture for the company. The best thing a leader can do is to shape a healthy culture to ensure alignment to the business, helping to retain employees by keeping them challenged and happy.

Today, we are honored to have as our guest speaker, Florian Gottein share with us the key initiatives of the European Chamber of Commerce of the Philippines.

Finally, as always, Makati West Men of Zest, let's execute on our theme, "Increase Our Capacity to Serve" and remember our winning 3R's (aligned to our culture): Recognize, Retain and Recruit.
